

Owners of DiesElectrics, Anthony and Kelly Wenning, will receive a Small Business Accelerator grant of $5500 to conduct a strategic review of their business.

Grant shows new service finds niche

Dalby will benefit from an innovative local auto electrical and diesel mechanical business, which has been awarded a Small Business Accelerator (SBA) grant for its cutting-edge business and technology processes.

Small Business Minister Chris Cummins said DiesElectrics would receive a Stage 1 SBA grant of $5500 to develop a business growth plan.

"This family company, which took over the business in April last year, provides high quality automotive services to the agricultural, mining, trade and transport industries," Mr Cummins said.

"This is a cutting-edge business combining traditional auto-electrical services with new technologies and the funding will help them assess and improve their business processes."

Kellie Wenning, who owns and operates the business with her husband Anthony, said the recognition confirmed DiesElectrics was making progress with its goal to be a valuable part of the Dalby business community.

"With so many new industries emerging in our region, we could see the need to ensure Dalby could provide high quality trade services.

"That's why we decided to be proactive about getting these services up and running in advance.

"The last thing we wanted to see was new industries, like mining and energy, having to go out of town for high quality trade services."
